Friedman shows that the front stage drama fulfills these needs and expectations while backstage contacts between lead bargainers allow the two sides to negotiate in private. The traditional labor negotiation process he reveals is an integrated system that allows for both private understanding and public conflict.

During the late Middle Ages, the Confrérie de la Passion in Paris, a charitable institution licensed to produce religious drama in 1402, converted a hall in the hôtel de la trinité into a theatre. It is unclear which of the following two configurations the theatre adopted: an end stage arrangement with an audience seated around or an end stage arrangement with an audience seated around.
